ABSTRACT

In August 1972, a survey was taken of 121 randomly selected Naval Undersea Center employees who had completed training courses between June 1971 and May 1972. The questionnaire was designed to determine how useful the employees felt the courses were in relation to their jobs. Supervisors of 55 of the employees were asked to evaluate the training programs in terms of the employee's job performances. At the completion of the courses the employees were generally satisfied and 90.1 percent felt the courses were pertinent to their job needs. A follow-up evaluation in August 1972 revealed that only 76.5 percent found the courses useful to their career development. The data processing course appeared to have the least career-development value; the clerical courses seemed to have the greatest value. (RS)

INTRODUCTION

1

A survey was taken in August 1972 of 121 NUC employees who had completed a training course between June 1971 and May 1972. Supervisors of 55 of these employees were also surveyed. The sample for the survey was chosen randomly from all the employees who had completed training within this period.

The questionnaire sent to the employees was designed to determine how useful to their job they thought the training was. The supervisor's questionnaire asked for an evaluation of the training in terms of the employee's job performance. See appendices (1) and (2) for copies of the questionnaires used in the study.

The following table shows how many people in each of the specified courses areas were surveyed.

FOLLOW-UP ANALYSIS

The overall course evaluation shows that the employees were generally pleased with the courses and found them to be pertinent to their needs and interests. Furthermore, they believed the courses would contribute to their career development. However, the follow-up evaluation done for this study shows that the employees are not as pleased with the courses in August 1972 as they were at the time they completed them. Presently, the overall evaluation shows that only 76.5% of the employees feel the course has helped them to do a better job; whereas, at the time they first evaluated the course 90.1% felt the course had contributed to their career development and 99.2% believed the course was pertinent to their present and future needs and interests. Now only 82.4% of the employees responded that they use the training at least somewhat.

The courses in the data processing section appear to have had the least value since only 71.4% of the employees sampled believe the training has helped them to do a better job and only 71.4% of the employees use the training at least somewhat. The clerical courses seem to have had the greatest value since 84.6% of the employees sampled believe the training has helped them to do a better job and 100% of these employees use the training at least somewhat. However, it should be recognized that this is only a relative comparison and that a definite majority of the employees found these courses to be useful.

The following pages present some tables which will show how the employees presently feel about the training they received through these courses.

A slight majority of the supervisor's, 59.3%, responded that the employee was doing a better job as a result of the training course. However, 90.6% of the supervisors responded that the training was valuable for the employee. This seems to exemplify the major finding of this study that seldom is obvious change produced in the employee's performance as a result of a particular training course. Neither the employee nor the supervisor can clearly specify how the training course has affected the employee's performance. Since the completion of the course the employees quantity, quality or level of work may have increased; however, it is difficult to determine if the training or other factors produced this change.

The following pages present an analysis of the supervisor's questionnaire.
